ABSTRACT

Environmental resource degradation has been controversial in the recent past between the industrial sector and environmental management agencies. This is because most industries, if not all, exploit natural resources directly or indirectly. Current fears of environmental resource degradation with continued exposures to pollutants, coupled with the vigilance of environmental protection organizations in implementing Environmental laws and policies, has initiated the establishment of environment departments in almost all of functioning industries as a move to protect, promote against and to actively prevent environment degradation. This in addition has also boosted the Corporate Social Responsibility of manufacturing industries. The main objective of this research work was to find out if the corporate society of Bamburi Cement was putting in equal efforts on environmental conservation to compensate for the natural environmental resource they utilize in their daily operations. This research dwelt on the resources being utilized by Bamburi Cement Factory and their intervention towards ensuring the natural resources were protected besides enhancing human living standards. I collected Information from Bamburi Cement Factory, Kenya Red Cross Society – Mombasa Branch, Kiembeni Hospital and Mombasa General Hospital. The key areas of the study were to analyze Bamburi's intervention towards a clean environment and human health protection and the local community's perspective in concern to their operating in the area. From this analysis, it was clear that Bamburi Cement's measures to conserve environment and protect human health were confined to a target group of persons, their staff.
