ABSTRACT

Learning institutions in Kenya have been plagued with cases of students' unrest and indiscipline. Students' unrest and indiscipline undermine the quality education. As a result of students' unrest and indiscipline, there has been destruction of property and even lives have been lost.

This study intends to find out the extent to which preventive measures on student unrest and indiscipline in Kenyan education institutions are being implemented and specifically in Igembe North District.

The study aims at investigating the extent to which teachers and school administrators are prepared to tackle the problem of unrest commonly known as strikes among the students.

An attempt will also be made to find out some of the challenges faced by the teachers and students while fighting such unrests in schools and the application of the preventive measures to help curb the problem of unrest among students. The researcher will further target to investigate and find out whether the available and commonly used preventive measures are availing any help in helping curb the problem at Igembe North District.

It will also address issues like why are the strikes so common yet they can be prevented? Who has failed? The data will be analyzed using descriptive statistics and recommendations given.
